

Dinosaur Jr. Western Mass-ters

NORTH ADAMS, MASSACHUSETTS — If Neil Young is, as Kurt Cobain said, “the Godfather of Grunge,” Dinosaur Jr. frontman J Mascis is his consiglieri — a mastermind whose screaming, crunching guitar ushered in an era and helped define alt-rock in the 1990s. Formed in Amherst in 1984, Dinosaur Jr. has maintained its looming presence over its three-plus decades, waxing and waning as genres come and go, but re-emerging in the last few years to assume its proper mantel as elder statesmen of viscerally badass rock ‘n’ roll. The band’s latest record, Give a Glimpse of What Yer Not, drops on August 5; they are back, as conquering Western Mass. heroes, to support it, playing to a full house on Saturday, December 10, at 8pm.

With an eclectic vibe that stood out amidst the speed of 1980s hard-core punk, Dinosaur Jr. pioneered and revolutionized the American alternative rock scene in the early years of its inception. The band’s signature flare of twangy sound, high-volume din, and distortion-saturated performances has maintained a loyal fan base in the 32 years since its beginning. Following the breakup of his high school band, Deep Wound, in 1984, Mascis entered into a stage of new-wave songwriting and founded a band comprised of himself as songwriter and vocalist, Lou Barlow as lead vocalist and bassist, and Edward Murphy, known as Murph, as drummer. Taking on the name “Dinosaur,” the group released an adrenalized debut album Dinosaur in 1985.

After the release of its second album You’re Living All Over Me (1987), the group changed its name to Dinosaur Jr., and within a year, its third album Bug (1988) reached number 1 on the UK independent chart and maintained a spot therein for 38 weeks. Creative tension between the members in the late ‘80s caused the band to undergo a handful of lineup changes into the ‘90s. Although Barlow had left the group to pursue an independent career — founding lo-fi seminal slacker rock band Sebadoh — Dinosaur Jr. went on to produce six albums, including Green Mind (1991), Where You Been (1993), and Without a Sound (1994), before disbanding in 1997.

The original trio reunited in 2005, marked by a stunning appearance on The Late Show with Craig Ferguson in April, and kicked off a European tour later that June. Mark Beaumont of The Guardian notes, “It’s remarkable how fresh and visceral Dinosaur Jr. still sounds.” As veteran rockers they have worked on three albums with indie label Jagjaguwar: Farm (2009), I Bet on Sky (2012), and 2016’s highly anticipated Give a Glimpse of What Yer Not. In 2014, Mascis released a solo effort, the stripped-down and much-lauded Tied to a Star that highlighted his dexterous picking, while securing his status as grunge-rock guitar hero. Give a Glimpse of What Yer Not promises to deliver everything fans love about the band:

mind-numbing Mascis guitar solos, Barlow's heavy fuzz bass, and Murph's crashing percussion. With a reputation for what Pitchfork describes as "catchy and well-crafted songs that never feel restricted or overly polished," expect to be bouncing out of your Doc Martens all night.
