Jaimeo Brown Transcendence
featuring Chris Sholar and Jaleel Shaw

NORTH ADAMS, MASSACHUSETTS — Musician Jaimeo Brown, performing with his ensemble, Transcendence, fuses jazz, hip-hop, and blues. Presented in confluence with Allison Janae Hamilton’s exhibition, Pitch, the evening will include Brown’s provocative piece Work Songs which samples the sounds and music of unknown laborers. With songs of the jailhouse, the coal mine, and the gandy dancer, Brown argues that through music we can transcend oppression and the traditional constraints of creativity. Preferred ticket buyers are invited to a gallery tour and recital at 3pm, before the main event on Saturday, August 18, at 8pm.

Jaimeo Brown grew up in the 1980s Bay Area as West Coast hip-hop took over the radio waves, and gang culture sprouted in his neighborhood. He found shelter in music, equally inspired by the beats and samples of J Dilla, Dr. Dre, and DJ Premier, and the raw eloquence of Coltrane, Miles Davis, and Art Blakey. With the guidance of his musical family and drum teacher, Sly Randolph — himself a Bernard Purdie protégé — Brown’s multifaceted interest has become a 20-year music-making career, during which he’s worked with a range of musicians including Stevie Wonder, Carlos Santana, A Tribe Called Quest, Bobby Hutcherson, and more.

The origins of Jaimeo Brown Transcendence lie in recordings of the Gee’s Bend quilters. The songs of this isolated African-American community on the Alabama River found their way into Jaimeo’s life over a decade ago. It was only recently, however, that he started to experiment with weaving samples of the Gee’s Bend into his own music. When he realized the potential there, Brown reached out to longtime friend Chris Sholar — a Grammy-winning producer and guitarist who has worked with Stevie Wonder, Kanye West, Beyoncé, and Whitney Houston — to collaborate on the project. Together they uncovered a tapestry in which a digital future meets a hand-stitched past, blending early recordings of blues, jazz, and folk songs with live hip-hop, jazz, and electronic elements.

Transcendence’s eponymously titled 2013 debut elicited glowing reviews from the Los Angeles Times, JazzTimes, DownBeat, and The Guardian, which noted that the album is “as powerful as it is ambitious...the resulting soundscapes are a dialogue between the present and a collective past of suffering and salvation, with echoes of Coltrane.” Their follow-up album, Work Songs, looks beyond Gee’s Bend but continues to center historical field recordings of laborers. Joined by saxophonists Jaleel Shaw and others, the album weaves music that rose from America’s cotton fields and rural Japan with blissed-out free jazz, distorted blues rock, and electronic riffs to create “one of the most exciting, experimental, and important albums set to drop this year” (Vice).

Before the ensemble’s large concert in the evening, Jaimeo Brown Transcendence will perform an innovative set for Preferred Ticket Buyers in the museum galleries at 3pm in response to Allison Janae Hamilton’s exhibition Pitch. The exhibition conjures the rich landscape of the South — from its sights and smells to its unmistakable sounds. Both artists engage with the legacy of labor and the music it has inspired, sharing an interest in how music defines both place and its inhabitants, while transcending specifics.

On Saturday, August 18, at 8pm Jaimeo Brown Transcendence brings the sounds of work, labor, and humanity to the Dré Pavilion. Joining Jaimeo Brown and Chris Sholar is saxophonist Jaleel Shaw who won the DownBeat Critics Poll’s for Rising Star Alto Saxophonist in 2014. A longtime member of the Roy Haynes Quartet and Tom Harrell’s “Colors Of A Dream,” Shaw has performed with Jason Moran, the Mingus Big Band, Pat Metheny, and Chick Corea, among others.
